The Web services architecture generally supports several tiers, such as the "client tier" (e.g., the user interface through which a user interacts with an application), the "back end tier" (i.e., the application logic), and the "business tier" (i.e., the data and its handling). The business tier services are consumed by the client tier and by the business logic at the back end tier. For example, a user of a computer application program can access the Web services using a client tier program (e.g., via a web browser) and can invoke the application logic using the client tier program. Typically, the client tier program is a thin client program that is responsible for providing the user interface (i.e., the user interface that enables the user to interact with the application logic) and for providing input to the application logic. The back end tier of the Web services architecture provides a standard interface for invoking services. Many people use software tools to view the Uniform Resource Identifier (URI), also referred to as the Web address or a Uniform Resource Locator (URL), of a Uniform Resource Locator (URL) (URLL) Web page. The software tools are typically in the form of plug-in programs. For example, many browsers can include a plug-in software package called a "Web plug-in," which can display the Web page having the target URI. Web plug-ins are especially useful for Web browsing. Web browser plug-ins are browser add-on programs that perform functions not provided by the browser itself, such as downloading and displaying Web pages or pages of Web content (i.e., one or more Web pages that are accessible via the Internet, intranet, or other networks). Web browser plug-ins facilitate access to Web pages because they allow a Web browser to be extended. Typically, when a Web page is accessed, a plug-in is used to download and display a thumbnail image of the Web page.The Zetas, one of the most powerful and violent of the
